PERFORMANCE BASED STRUCTURAL DESIGN: WHY DO WE NEED IT?

PROF. SUMAN BAIS

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR, RUNGTA COLLEGE OF ENGINEERING AND TECHNOLOGY, RAIPUR

ABSTRACT- This article discusses the need for performance design approach in the field of structural engineering.

Are our structures safe?

Structural engineers often get asked the question by clients and the public that whether their structure is going to be safe after design. The most common answer given by structural engineers could be that they will follow the design codes and engineering practices and that is intended to provide safe structures. However, this answer may not be satisfactory or sufficient for the public, seeking explicit confirmation. In this article we will try to address this question and see how the performance-based design may provide one of the solutions and why we need to do a performance-based design evaluation of structures for establishing explicit safety.

How to determine safety of structures?

To determine the safety of structure, we investigate how the hazards and safety is connected in relation to disaster. As depicted in Equation-01, the disaster is a product of three things; the hazard which is a natural or man-made event, vulnerability which is the inappropriate built environment or the weaknesses in the environment that is being hit by the event, and an exposure which is the people, property or anything of value that is exposed to that hazard. A disaster is severe if we have high exposure, high vulnerability, and high level of hazard. Most often there is not much that can be done about the hazards but sometimes we can control exposure by evacuating the buildings or constructing the buildings where there is a low hazard moreover. As structural engineers, we can control the vulnerability i.e., the weakness in the structure. The structure will be safe when the vulnerability will be low and then the effect of disaster will be low.

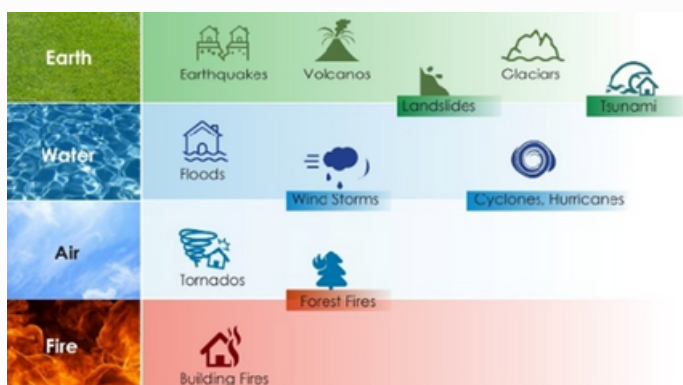

FIG. VARIOUS TYPES OF HAZARDS THAT CAN AFFECT STRUCTURAL SAFETY
